

RECEIVED
AUG 31 2015
CLERK OF SUPREME COURT OF WISCONSIN

SUPREME COURT
STATE OF WISCONSIN

Appeal No. 2014-AP-400

JAMES A. BLACK, GLEN J. PODLESNIK, AND STEEN J. VAN ERDEN, Plaintiffs-Respondents-Petitioners,

MILWAUKEE PROFESSIONAL FIRE FIGHTERS
ASSOCIATION LOCAL 215,
Intervenor-Plaintiffs-Respondent-Petitioners,

MILWAUKEE POLICE ASSOCIATION AND MICHAEL V. CRIVELLO, Plaintiffs-Respondents-Cross-Appellants-Petitioners,

v.

CITY OF MILWAUKEE,
Defendant-Appellant-Cross-Respondent.

On Appeal from the District 1 Court of Appeals
Decision Dated July 21, 2015
Court of Appeals Case No. 2014-AP-400
Trial Court Case No. 2013-CV-5977

AMICUS CURIAE BRIEF OF THE
WISCONSIN INSTITUTE OF LAW & LIBERTY
IN SUPPORT OF THE PETITION FOR REVIEW

Richard M. Esenberg, WBN 1005622
Thomas C. Kamenick, WBN 1063682
Wisconsin Institute for Law & Liberty
1139 East Knapp Street
Milwaukee, WI 53202

Kenneth Chesebro
(pro hac vice status pending)
1600 Massachusetts Ave., No. 801
Cambridge, MA 02138

August 31, 2015

Table of Contents

Table of Authorities ii

Interest of Amicus Curiae 1

Introduction and Summary of Argument 2

ARGUMENT 6

I. The Court of Appeals’ “With Uniformity” Analysis
Conflicts With This Court’s Jurisprudence 7

II. The Court of Appeals’ “Statewide Concern” Analysis
Conflicts With This Court’s Jurisprudence 10

A. No Weight Given to Legislative Finding 10

B. Perverse Penalization of the Legislature’s
Consideration of Objections to Proposed Reform 13

Conclusion 14

Certificate of Compliance With Section 809.19(8)(b) & (c) 15

Certificate of Compliance With Section 809.19(12) 16

Table of Authorities

CASES:	PAGE:
Adams v. State Livestock Facilities Siting Review Bd. , 2012 WI 85, 342 Wis.2d 444, 820 N.W.2d 404	13
Madison Teachers, Inc. v. Walker , 2014 WI 99, 358 Wis.2d 1, 851 N.W.2d 337	4, 6-7, 11
State ex rel. Ekern v. City of Milwaukee , 190 Wis. 633, 209 N.W. 860 (1926)	9
State ex rel. Ozanne v. Fitzgerald , 2011 WI 43, 334 Wis.2d 70, 798 N.W.2d 436	13
Thompson v. Kenosha County , 64 Wis.2d 673, 221 N.W.2d 845 (1974)	11
Wisconsin Ass’n of Food Dealers v. City of Madison , 97 Wis.2d 426, 293 N.W.2d 540 (1980)	11
 CONSTITUTION, STATUTES, AND ORDINANCE:
WIS. CONST. art. XI, § 3(1)	passim
IOWA CODE § 400.17(3)	2
MICH. COMP. LAWS § 15.602	2-3
MINN. STAT. § 415.16	2
OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 9.481(C)	2-3
2013 Wis. Act 20, § 1270, codified at WIS. STAT. § 66.0502	passim
MILWAUKEE CITY ORDINANCE 5-02	4
 BOOKS, ARTICLES, AND PAPERS:
WILLIAM ANDERSON, AMERICAN CITY GOVERNMENT (1925)	1
Brian Duncan, Using Municipal Residency Requirements to Disguise Public Policy , 33 PUB. FIN. REV. 84 (2005)	12
Peter K. Esinger, Municipal Residency Requirements and the Local Economy , 64 SOC. SCI. Q. 85 (1983)	1-2
ALBERT O. HIRSCHMANN, EXIT, VOICE, AND LOYALTY: RESPONSES TO DECLINE IN FIRMS, ORGANIZATIONS, AND STATES (1970)	2
Legislative Fiscal Bureau, Local Government Employee Residency Requirements (Paper # 554) (May 9, 2013)	3, 11-12

BOOKS, ARTICLES, AND PAPERS:	PAGE:
Thomas A. Lifvendahl, The Residency Requirement: City of Milwaukee (Feb. 4, 2012)	12
Stephen L. Mehay & Kenneth P. Seiden, Municipal Residency Requirements and Local Public Budgets , 48 PUB. CHOICE 27 (1986)	1
M. Scott Niederjohn & Mark C. Schug, The Milwaukee Iron Curtain (Fall 2006)	12
Christina Plerhoples, Municipal Residency Requirement Laws and Their Impact on Cities (2013)	12
David J. Schall, An Investigation Into the Relationship Between Municipal Police Residency Requirements, Professionalism, Economic Conditions and Equal Employment Goals (1996) (unpublished Ph.D. dissertation, Urban Studies Program, Univ. of Wisconsin–Milwaukee)	1-2
Wisc. Policy Research Inst., The Milwaukee Teacher Residency Requirement: Why It’s Bad for Schools, and Why It Won’t Go Away (June 2006)	12

Interest of Amicus Curiae

The Wisconsin Institute for Law & Liberty is a nonprofit, public interest law firm dedicated to promoting the public interest in free markets, limited government, individual liberty, and a robust civil society.

Introduction and Summary of Argument

A common feature of urban “machine” politics dating back more than a century was that only people who lived — and voted — in a city could hold city jobs.¹ This empowered local politicians by creating a bloc of voters that would reliably favor bigger government, more pay, and higher taxes.² Beginning in the 1970s, local politicians presiding over decaying urban centers relied on residency restrictions to confine city employees (and their spending power and tax dollars) within city borders and stem the outflow of middle-class families who would otherwise move to the suburbs

¹ See, e.g., WILLIAM ANDERSON, AMERICAN CITY GOVERNMENT 455, 465 & n.11 (1925); Peter K. Esinger, Municipal Residency Requirements and the Local Economy, 64 SOC. SCI. Q. 85, 86 (1983); David J. Schall, An Investigation into the Relationship Between Municipal Police Residency Requirements, Professionalism, Economic Conditions and Equal Employment Goals 2-4, 23, 29 (1996) (unpublished Ph.D. dissertation, Urban Studies Program, Univ. of Wisconsin–Milwaukee).

² See, e.g., Stephen L. Mehay & Kenneth P. Seiden, Municipal Residency Requirements and Local Public Budgets, 48 PUB. CHOICE 27, 28 (1986) (residency requirements “bring voters into the city who benefit disproportionately from high levels of public spending”); id. at 32 (data indicate “residency-law cities experience approximately 10 percent higher spending per capita”).

in search of a higher quality of life and better city services.³ Limiting exit options reduces pressure on local politicians to reform city governance.⁴

In recent years, legislators in various states, better situated than local politicians to take a broader view of the public interest, have overridden these municipal restraints on employee choice. Their view has been that residents of a state generally should have an equal opportunity both to live and to work where they wish, and that the removal of residency requirements which artificially reduce the average quality of municipal employees (a particular concern in the field of state-funded primary and secondary school education) will enhance the overall well being of state residents. Such statutes are currently in force in several nearby Midwestern states: Minnesota, Iowa, Michigan, and Ohio.⁵

³ See Esinger, supra note 1, at 86-88, 94-95; Schall, supra note 1, at 7, 32, 219.

⁴ Exit is, of course, a highly valued option for consumers confronted with a deterioration in the quality of any good or service, and a vital means of ensuring that producers (both in the private sector and in government) of goods and services vigorously compete to maximize consumer welfare. See generally ALBERT O. HIRSCHMANN, EXIT, VOICE, AND LOYALTY: RESPONSES TO DECLINE IN FIRMS, ORGANIZATIONS, AND STATES 1, 5, 21-29 (1970). “The United States owes its very existence and growth to millions of decisions favoring exit,” id. at 106, and Americans’ “belief in exit as a fundamental and beneficial social mechanism has been unquestioning,” id. at 112.

⁵ By the 1980s, Minnesota in general banned its municipalities from imposing residency requirements on their employees, MINN. STAT. § 415.16, and Iowa only allowed cities to require public-safety employees to live within “a reasonable maximum distance” outside the city. IOWA CODE § 400.17(3). In 1999 Michigan granted all municipal employees the right to live up to 20 miles outside their work jurisdiction.

The question presented is whether the Wisconsin Constitution somehow renders our Legislature powerless to adopt this reform.

As of 2011, at least 114 Wisconsin municipalities had “some type of restriction on where their employees may reside” (of which thirteen “required all of their employees to live within the municipal limits”), 30 counties imposed residency requirements of some sort, and one school district (Milwaukee’s) had a residency requirement for its employees.⁶

In 2013 the Legislature enacted a simple, uniform rule. In 2013 Wis. Act 20, § 1270, codified at WIS. STAT. § 66.0502, it declared the matter of residency requirements to be one of “statewide concern,” § 66.0502(1), and it imposed a uniform ban (applicable to every city, village, town, county, and school district, § 66.0502(2)) on residency requirements, § 66.0502(3) — except that public-safety personnel could be required to reside within 15 miles of the locality they serve. § 66.0502(4).

In response, the City of Milwaukee Common Council enacted a charter ordinance asserting that the statute violated Milwaukee’s MICH. COMP. LAWS § 15.602. In 2006 Ohio granted (with limited exceptions) all municipal employees “the right to reside any place they desire.” OHIO REV. CODE ANN. § 9.481(C).

⁶ Legislative Fiscal Bureau, Local Government Employee Residency Requirements (Paper # 554) (May 9, 2013), at 3 (available at <http://goo.gl/hO94gt>).

constitutional home-rule authority under WIS. CONST. art. XI, § 3(1), and ordering the continued enforcement of Milwaukee’s local residency rule (MILWAUKEE CITY ORDINANCE 5-02).⁷ Representatives of the Milwaukee police and fire fighters promptly filed suit. On cross-motions for summary judgment, the trial court rejected Milwaukee’s constitutional home-rule argument and invalidated the ordinance.

The court of appeals reversed, and reinstated Milwaukee’s residency requirement, holding that § 66.0502 invaded Milwaukee’s constitutional home-rule authority under WIS. CONST. art. XI, § 3(1) because: (1) contrary to the Legislature’s explicit finding, the statute does not involve a matter of “statewide concern,” slip op. at ¶¶20-30; and (2) despite the statute applying uniformly to every city, village, town, county, and school district, it does not meet the constitutional requirement that it apply “with uniformity,” id. at ¶¶31-34.

Although the court of appeals did not strike down § 66.0502 (holding merely that it “does not apply to the City of Milwaukee,” slip op. at ¶35), its decision largely guts the reform enacted by the Legislature, as other cities and villages presumably will feel free to pass a similar charter ordinance exempting themselves from the statute if this Court leaves the decision below undisturbed. Cities and villages differ in how they are impacted by § 66.0502, so presumably it will be the “worst offenders” (those who have most heavily restricted the residential freedom of their employees), who will enact charter ordinances, complaining of “disproportionate” impact.

⁷ Court of Appeals slip op. at ¶9 (resolution available at <http://bit.ly/1VbFckR>). Enactment of a charter ordinance pursuant to WIS. STAT. § 66.0101 was necessary to any assertion by Milwaukee that its constitutional home-rule authority over its “local affairs” overrides state law. Madison Teachers, Inc. v. Walker, 2014 WI 99, ¶89 n.27, 358 Wis.2d 1, 851 N.W.2d 337.

This Court should grant review to resolve a significant question regarding the scope of constitutional home-rule authority under art. XI, § 3(1), because the court of appeals’ decision conflicts with controlling decisions of this Court interpreting art. XI, §3(1), and because until this Court authoritatively rules regarding § 66.0502, no municipal employee can be certain of his or her residential rights under Wisconsin law.

This brief sketches the stark conflict between the decision below and this Court’s jurisprudence on two points. In Part I we address the court of appeals’ holding that the Legislature did not act “with uniformity.” In Part II we address the court of appeals’ holding that the Legislature did not act on a matter of “statewide concern.”

ARGUMENT

The court of appeals' decision conflicts with controlling decisions of this Court, most notably last year's decision in Madison Teachers, Inc. v. Walker, 2014 WI 99, 358 Wis.2d 1, 851 N.W.2d 337. There, this Court resolved a fundamental disagreement concerning "the proper legal test to employ in determining whether a legislative enactment violates the home rule amendment" of WIS. CONST. art. XI, § 3(1). 2014 WI 99, at ¶89. Applying that legal test, it then rejected Milwaukee's home-rule challenge to a provision in Act 10 regulating employee pensions even though: (1) it burdened only Milwaukee, and (2) the Legislature had made no legislative finding that this particular pension regulation involved a matter of statewide concern. Id., ¶¶102-29; see also id., ¶¶217-32 (Bradley, J., dissenting).

Milwaukee's home-rule challenge is even weaker in this case. Here the Legislature, far from singling out Milwaukee for special regulation, has merely subjected Milwaukee and all other municipalities to a uniform, statewide limit on residency requirements for municipal employees. And here the Legislature did make an explicit finding that this is a matter of statewide concern.

I. The Court of Appeals’ “With Uniformity” Analysis Conflicts With This Court’s Jurisprudence

To sustain its claim that its constitutional home-rule authority trumps the statute, Milwaukee must show: (1) that the matter regulated is not predominantly one of “statewide concern; and (2) that the statute does not apply “with uniformity” to “every city or every village.” Madison Teachers, 2014 WI 99, ¶¶90-95, 99, 101. A failure to make both showings dooms any assertion of constitutional home-rule authority.

We first address the court of appeals’ “with uniformity” analysis. Even though § 66.0502’s restriction on residency requirements explicitly applies to every city, village, or other local governmental unit, the court nonetheless held that it somehow does not apply “with uniformity” to “every city or every village” within the meaning of art. XI, § 3(1). The court’s theory is that it would be “illogical” to limit analysis to whether, on its face, the statute treats every city or village with uniformity — a court should also consider whether the statute will “have an outsize impact” on a particular city or village. Slip op. at ¶¶32-33. Believing that only Milwaukee “will be deeply and broadly affected” by the statute, the court concluded that it “does not uniformly affect every city or village in this state.” Id. ¶33.

In other words, the court seized on the word “affect” to adopt an unprecedented “disparate impact” test for constitutional home-rule analysis. This is an interpretive contrivance. It is difficult to imagine a uniform law that would not impact the hundreds of municipalities in Wisconsin in different ways. To read the constitutional language to impose a “disparate impact” test would be to read it out of the Constitution. The Legislature could never regulate “with uniformity,” because all statutes have differing impacts on different cities and villages.

And this theory is contrary to this Court’s jurisprudence. In Thompson v. Kenosha County, 64 Wis.2d 673, 221 N.W.2d 845 (1974), this Court considered a statute that on its face applied to all counties in Wisconsin, facilitating the ability of counties to establish their own assessor system to displace those in the cities, villages, and towns in the county. Kenosha County residents challenging the statute pointed out, reasonably enough, that despite being facially neutral, the impact of the statute was hardly uniform, because only cities, villages, and towns within Kenosha County were affected (all other counties having already established assessor systems). 64 Wis.2d at 683. This Court held that it was enough that the statute was, “on its face, uniformly applicable throughout the state.”

Id. at 687. The “actual effect” of the statute was irrelevant because the statute was “supported by a reasonable justification,” given that “achieving uniformity in property taxation and upgrading the quality of the assessment process” were “important public goals.” Id. at 688.

In its uniformity analysis, the court of appeals ignored Thompson, slip op. at ¶¶31-34, even though it was cited by plaintiffs on this exact point. Fire Fighters Resp. Br., Dec. 4, 2014, at 9; Police Resp. Br., Dec. 5, 2014, at 24. Instead, the court relied on State ex rel. Ekern v. City of Milwaukee, 190 Wis. 633, 209 N.W. 860 (1926). Slip op. at ¶32. But Ekern is the polar opposite of this case. This case involves a statute applicable to all municipalities, establishing a statewide policy that generally municipal employees should be free to reside where they wish. Ekern involved a statute limiting the height of buildings to 150 feet, not as a matter of statewide policy, but only in Milwaukee. On its face, the statute failed the “with uniformity” aspect of art. XI, § 3(1). Thus, after holding that the height of Milwaukee’s buildings was “clearly a local affair,” this Court correctly concluded that Milwaukee’s constitutional home-rule authority shielded it from the statute. 190 Wis. at 862.

The court of appeals' analysis of the "with uniformity" aspect of art. XI, § 3(1), is indefensible and warrants review.

II. The Court of Appeals' "Statewide Concern" Analysis Conflicts with This Court's Jurisprudence

Review of the court of appeals' analysis of the whether or not eliminating residency requirements throughout the state is a matter of statewide concern is also warranted, for two independent reasons.

A. No Weight Given to Legislative Finding

In enacting statewide limits on the ability of municipalities to control the residency of their employees, the Legislature explicitly found this matter to be of "statewide concern." § 66.0502. This Court has consistently held that "great weight" must be accorded such findings in cases involving the assertion of constitutional home-rule authority. E.g., Wisconsin Ass'n of Food Dealers v. City of Madison, 97 Wis.2d 426, 431, 293 N.W.2d 540, 543 (1980).

Yet the court of appeals accorded no weight to the Legislature's finding. It reasoned that in enacting § 66.0502, the Legislature did not compile a factual record sufficient to prove, to the court's satisfaction, that residency requirements are, in fact, a matter of statewide concern — the point was “never substantiated, and only given lip-service with broad policy arguments.” Slip op. at ¶21.⁸ So the judges below simply disregarded the Legislature’s finding. Id. (“Because the legislature’s claim that residency requirements are a matter of statewide concern, see § 66.0502(1), is unsubstantiated, it does not influence our decision.”).

The decision below, faulting the Legislature for not compiling a legislative record proving, to the court’s satisfaction, that residency restrictions are a matter of statewide concern, conflicts with numerous decisions in which this Court has found statewide concern based on a general analysis of the subject matter, without any reference to material in the legislative record.⁹

The court below should not have rejected the Legislature’s finding without considering whether articles, reports, or other scholarly materials

⁸ The “broad policy arguments” referenced by the court are those set out in a legislative staff report, which listed six reasons why restricting residency requirements might be thought to benefit the state and its citizens. See Legislative Fiscal Bureau, supra note 6, at 4 (they may improve employee applicant pools, may improve quality of life for employees, may improve the ability to promote and retain experienced staff, and they respect fundamental interests of employees to live and travel where they wish).

⁹ E.g., Madison Teachers, 2014 WI 99, ¶¶111, 114-123; Adams v. State Livestock Facilities Siting Review Bd., 2012 WI 85, ¶29, 342 Wis.2d 444, 462-64, 820 N.W.2d 404, 413; Wisconsin Ass’n of Food Dealers v. City of Madison, 97 Wis.2d 426, 431, 293 N.W.2d 540, 543 (1980); Thompson v. Kenosha County, 64 Wis.2d 673, 683-86, 221 N.W.2d 845, 851-52 (1974).

exist which support the grounds for limiting residency restrictions listed in the legislative staff report, see note 6, supra, and other grounds that might rationally be advanced for statewide reform of residency restrictions. There is certainly no shortage of readily available research supporting the elimination of residency restrictions.¹⁰

But one need not be a social scientist to figure out what the rationale for this statewide reform might be. Dictating where people live might have struck legislators as fundamentally unfair (see note 4, supra) — a form of discrimination which, although not constitutionally proscribed, should be banned by legislation. Further, municipalities, including Milwaukee, receive substantial state aid. Legislators might have concluded that the efficient and effective use of state resources is best advanced by free and open competition for municipal employment. They might also have concluded that, just as job seekers are protected from discrimination based on other grounds, they should be able to compete for jobs without being burdened by their place of residence.

¹⁰ E.g., Christina Plerhoples, Municipal Residency Requirement Laws and Their Impact on Cities (2013) (available at <http://bit.ly/1NDH846>); Thomas A. Lifvendahl, The Residency Requirement: City of Milwaukee (Feb. 4, 2012) (available at <http://bit.ly/1JxbPRJ>); M. Scott Niederjohn & Mark C. Schug, The Milwaukee Iron Curtain (Fall 2006) (available at <http://bit.ly/1NJ6vAM>); Wisc. Policy Research Inst., The Milwaukee Teacher Residency Requirement: Why It's Bad for Schools, and Why It Won't Go Away (June 2006) (available at <http://bit.ly/1KPheEr>); Brian Duncan, Using Municipal Residency Requirements to Disguise Public Policy, 33 PUB. FIN. REV. 84 (2005).

This Court should grant the petition and reverse the court of appeals for its failure to defer to the Legislature's finding of statewide concern.

B. Perverse Penalization of the Legislature's Consideration of Objections to Proposed Reform

There is a further, independent flaw in the court of appeals' analysis: its penalization of the Legislature's act of taking seriously, and studying, Milwaukee's objections to the proposed legislation — its theory that the Legislature's diligent examination of Milwaukee's objections to the proposal somehow proves that the proposal was not of statewide concern, but was only of concern to Milwaukee. Slip op. at ¶¶5-8, 21-22.

This holding is perverse; if upheld, it would mean that the Legislature would be better off simply ignoring all objections to potential home-rule limitations. It also runs contrary to the spirit, if not the letter, of this Court's decisions barring interference with the internal operations of the Legislature, even where it is undisputed that the Legislature violated its own rules for considering legislation. E.g., State ex rel. Ozanne v. Fitzgerald, 2011 WI 43, ¶13, 334 Wis.2d 70, 798 N.W.2d 436. At least as much comity should be accorded the Legislature where, as here, it violated no rule — and yet the court of appeals has, in effect, punished it for giving careful consideration to objections lodged against a bill. Courts should not give legislatures incentives to govern more carelessly.

Conclusion

The petition for review should be granted.

August 31, 2015

Respectfully submitted,

Richard M. Esenberg,
State Bar # 1005622
Thomas C. Kamenick
State Bar # 1063682

Wisconsin Institute for Law & Liberty
1139 E. Knapp St.
Milwaukee, WI 53202
(414) 727-6367 (Esenberg)
(414) 727-6368 (Kamenick)
rick@will-law.org
tom@will-law.org

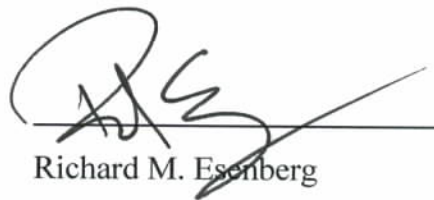

Kenneth Chesebro
(pro hac vice status pending)
1600 Massachusetts Ave., No. 801
Cambridge, MA 02138
(617) 661-4423
kenchesebro@msn.com

Attorneys for Amicus Curiae

Certificate of Compliance
With Section 809.19(8)(b) & (c)

I hereby certify that this brief conforms to the rules contained in Section 809.19(8)(b) & (c) for a brief produced with proportional serif font.
This brief is 2,946 words, calculated using the word count function of Microsoft Word 2013.

Dated: August 31, 2015

Richard M. Esenberg

Certificate of Compliance
With Section 809.19(12)

I hereby certify that I have submitted an electronic copy of this brief which complies with the requirements of Section 809.19(12). I further certify that this electronic brief is identical in content and format to the printed form of the brief filed as of this date. A copy of this certificate has been served with the paper copies of this brief filed with the Court and served on all parties.

Dated: August 31, 2015

Richard M. Esenberg